Seller Comments (Stock #: 57)

Although the Tesla name is now a household name, its Lotus-based roadster was something of a curiosity when it appeared in prototype form in 2006. Car enthusiasts, environmentalists, and early adopters clamored to buy the early cars and despite its six-figure pricetag and limited practicality owing to its sports car package, the Roadster sold in surprisingly large numbers, effectively demonstrating the proof of concept of the technology which is currently revolutionizing the automotive industry. Production began in the first quarter of 2008, and by summer of 2009, the Roadster Sport variant appeared, with an additional 40hp (now 288hp), which reduced the car's 0-60 time from 3.9 seconds to 3.7 seconds. A year later in the summer of 2010, the 2.5 generation of the car bowed, received further updates including new front and rear fascias, new wheels, and new seats, creating the definitive version of the Roadster. This particular example is a very late Roadster Sport with all the upgrades and updates. It was produced in August of 2011, the same month that US orders for the Roadster ended in anticipation of the conclusion of Roadster production after the production of more than 2,400 examples. It is a one-owner car, having been sold new to a Silicon Valley executive who has kept the car in the San Francisco Bay Area its entire life. It has covered fewer than 9,200 miles although it shows some sun damage in the form of cracking on the leading edge of the top of the dashboard, as well as fading to the clearcoat on some of the carbon fiber exterior trim. ## About the 2011 Tesla Roadster

This is general model information, and some of the features and/or specifications mentioned may not be available on all vehicles.

The Tesla Roadster 2.5's drivetrain is different from almost any car that's come before. It consists of only three major parts: a motor, a controller and a battery pack. The base motor makes 185 kW, which is equivalent to 248 hp in a gasoline-powered engine. The Sport model makes 215 kW, or 288 hp.
